Description

A lightning protection system is an integral part of the overall safety system of a building. It is designed to protect a structure from damages caused by lightning fires, high-voltage currents, and surges. Lightning protection system consists of three major components, including lightning rods, conductor cables, and ground rods. Lightning rods are the initial point of contact for a lightning strike. Down-conductors are connected to air terminals, providing a safe path to the ground rods; these ground rods disintegrate the lightning strike into the earth.
