Consumer goods are the final product in the production cycle of major industries and considered a commodity. These include foods, beverages, clothing, packaged goods, automobiles, and consumer electronics.

Consumer behavior is the main focus in the consumer goods industry. The boom witnessed in economies combined with the increased purchasing parity of consumers can lead to high demand of goods. Industries worldwide have invested in surveys and promotional events to gauge consumer behavior towards products. But the digitization has culminated in the same industries investing in data analytics. For instance, online search terms entered by consumers or previous searches are interpreted by the in-built artificial intelligence bots of companies to suggest recommendations. The purchase of these products is translated to the success of said software. In addition, Ads and social media are seen as powerful mediums to gain customer attention.

Consumer products are categorized into convenience products, specialty products, shopping products, and unsought products. Consumer products experience the maximum demand among the consumers as they are bought regularly, without making any buying effort. These products are generally low in cost and can be easily found in multiple locations, which makes their availability easier among the consumers. Shopping products require extensive consumer research and comparison of brands. Consumers generally compare on the basis of attributes such as the quality, style, and price while purchasing them.
