Customization, sustainability, and alternative, these are words which are characterizing the trends that are marking the present food and beverage (F&B) industry. Consumers are changing in the way they consider health. This is no longer only nutrition, but people are considering health more intuitively and holistically. They want to consume food and beverage, which make them feel good either physically, mentally, or emotionally.

With consumers becoming more concerned regarding what they eat and drink, functional foods have started to take a prominent role. Thus, this no longer remains a niche segment. The interest of consumers in the relationship between health and diet has increased substantially. Constant support for the vital role of foods such as wholegrain cereals, fruits, and vegetables in disease prevention coupled with the latest research on protective substances present in plants as well as dietary antioxidants has helped to offer the impetus for more advancements in the functional food market. Functional foods offer an array of benefits, including enhanced antioxidant activity, improved satiety, and better digestive function.
