SAN JOSE, CALIFORNIA, UNITED STATES, May 21, 2020

/EINPresswire.com/ -- Recent developments due to coronavirus have exasperated unfounded concerns that immigration is hurting America, but Jean Danhong Chen's insight as an expert indicates that immigration has nothing but positive outcomes for the United States economy and society.

Jean Danhong Chen Discusses Immigrants Impact on US Economy

Recent adjustments to United States immigration policies have created doubts as to whether the United States will continue to accept immigrants after the pandemic resolves. Last month, most immigration visas were suspended for a minimum of 60 days via President Trump's executive order. These significant changes to United States immigration policy have raised questions in regard to the future of immigration in the country. However, expert Jean Danhong Chen asserts that immigration is not just beneficial, but essential to America's economy and society.

Immigration from countries across the world (such as China) has always played a vital role in providing social and economic support to the United States. As the situation concerning the novel coronavirus unfolds in the coming months, Jean Danhong Chen asserts this truth will become increasingly apparent.

Chain and family-based migration deliver much-needed economic contributions to the nation. Immigrants provide necessary services in the American economy, account for significant economic growth, and play pivotal roles in many of the nation's key industries. Their presence in the workforce is essential in sustaining the country's financial wellbeing.

In the wake of the economic upheaval caused by the pandemic, Jean Danhong Chen asserts that these advantageous byproducts of immigration will become even more indispensable. As the coronavirus situation unfolds in the coming year, chain and family-based migration will prove crucial in helping to rebuild the American economy.
