Raccoons may shelter under your roof eave to stay out of the rain and sun. Sometimes tearing holes in your soffit screen and attic vents to have babies after they move in upstairs. One of the most prominent signs that you have raccoons living in your attic is the sound of them moving around. They are nocturnal animals, which means you will likely hear these sounds predominantly at night, and due to their large size in comparison to other pests, the noise they make can be quite distinctive.

2) The Smell of Raccoon Feces

The pests will usually designate an area of your attic as their toilet, which means after a short time, the odor can become quite noticeable. Nothing is safe, and that includes your pool. Sometimes being a place for a quick swim or a place to defecate. The spa deck and pool screens that they have ripped up while climbing up are also not safe from their bacteria-infested excrement

3) Look for Signs of Raccoons on your Property

Although regularly seeing raccoons around your property is a clear sign, they also make a significant mess, which means that another common sign of a raccoon infestation is damage around your home. They have incredibly sharp teeth and claws, which can quickly chew through wooden beams, drywall, and even your roof tiles, which in turn can cause damage to your insulation, wiring, and structural beams.

Raccoon Poop in your Pool

Raccoons become less adorable when you learn about the many germs and parasites they can pass off to humans. It is vital to make sure raccoons stay away from your pool or any other recreational area. If you see raccoon feces in and around your pool. You should immediately close your pool and prevent your children, or any pets from going for a swim until properly decontaminated.

Raccoon Poop is Hazardous to your Health

Raccoon feces can regularly be host to eggs from the worm called Baylisascaris procyonis. Humans will not typically come in contact with this parasite unless exposed to the fecal matter of raccoons and other suburban pests. Baylisascaris can cause an infection in people, which usually results in minor symptoms that are rarely noticed. Though when a large amount of eggs are accidentally swallowed by any vulnerable person, especially children, the Baylisascaris can hatch, leading to a severe condition that may damage the host's nervous system and eyes.

Chlorine is not enough to kill the parasite once a raccoon has left its dropping in and around your pool. So once you have the raccoon's feces tested, you will know whether you need to proceed with the following measures.

Was your pool contaminated by raccoon poop containing baylisascaris eggs? Then here is one example of what can be done to purge your pool of all contaminates properly.

- 1) First, you need to backwash your pool filter.
- 2) Next, you will want to drain and hose down your pool completely.
- 3) Make sure you wear disposable when you are changing any filters. Double-bag the waste material in thick plastic garbage bags. Throw your gloves in the bag and wash your hands thoroughly after sealing.
- 4) Now you can refill your pool with peace of mind.
