The Business Research Company

In the coming years, the steel roofing market size is projected to experience consistent growth, reaching $4.64 billion in 2029 with a compound annual growth rate (CAGR) of 2.5%. This projected growth during the forecast period is linked to factors such as population increase, concerns over climate change, trends in renovation and remodeling, a rise in disposable income, a focus on energy efficiency, and worldwide economic growth. Key trends expected during this period encompass the incorporation of smart roofing technologies, an emphasis on weather-resilient and extreme climate solutions, the emergence of pre-painted and pre-coated steel roofing products, increased interest in modular and prefabricated steel roofing systems, and partnerships for eco-friendly roofing solutions.

What Are The Current Leading Growth Drivers For Steel Roofing Market?

The steel roofing market is predicted to see an upward trajectory due to an anticipated surge in investments in the construction of residential buildings. Residential buildings, which may or may not include cooking or dining facilities, are erected for the sole purpose of accommodation and can encompass single-family homes, lodgings, or boarding houses. Utilization of steel roofing material in the construction of these dwellings aids in decreasing the construction costs. For example, in 2024, the UK's Office for National Statistics reported a 9.6% increment in total infrastructure investments from the general government, reaching £26.0 billion (approximately $32.8 billion). Central and local governments contributed £19.3 billion (around $24.4 billion) and £6.7 billion (about $8.5 billion) respectively, with transport projects accounting for £22.5 billion (roughly $28.5 billion) or 74.2% of the total investments, marking a 1.1 percentage point increase from the preceding year. Consequently, this rise in investments for residential building construction is fueling the growth of the steel roofing market.
