Consumer goods are commodities which are delivered to the user instead to another company for use. They are also known as final goods. Categorically, they are bifurcated into consumer durables and non-durables. Consumer durables comprise household goods, sports equipment, cars, and others. On the other hand, non-durables encompass fast-moving consumer goods (FMCG) and usually expendable. These include foods, beverages, petroleum, and clothing.

Fast-moving consumer goods (FMCG) consist of goods which occupy shelf space in retail outlets for a short duration. These goods can include foods and beverages. Advertising and marketing tactics such as posters, events, and exhibitions for displaying the strength and attractive factor of such goods can drive the sales of these products. Consumerization has pervaded the lifestyle of customers with nearly all of them choosing branded products. Personalization has become the mantra of all FMCG companies with many preferring it to simplify experiences for customers.

The consumer goods industry will experience huge demand due to the need for consumer appliances in China and India. Expendable income levels of consumers played a big role in this regard. Inclination towards shopping and various choices among e-commerce websites continued to entice customers. Deep discounts and price cutting are common characteristics within the industry.
