One of the unforeseen consequences of the Coronavirus shutdown has been the postponement of necessary dental procedures, such as wisdom teeth extractions. The new post deals with this issue head-on.

"San Francisco is a young city, a Mecca for people in their 20s and 30s. Unfortunately, many of these people still have their wisdom teeth and may not realize that those teeth may cause long-term damage to their smiles," explained San Francisco oral surgeon Dr. Alex Rabinovich. "This second post in our series reiterates the importance of having an oral surgeon in San Francisco examine one's wisdom teeth and give a recommendation as to whether they need to be extracted," he continued.

HURRY UP AND WAIT

Here is the background for this release. Many persons are familiar with the phrase, "Hurry up and wait." That phrase is very timely for many residents of San Francisco. Many residents finish college or high school and scurry to the city by the Bay to begin their adult lives. They hurry up to get going. Then, however, they may wait years too long to have their wisdom teeth extracted and yet do permanent damage to their smiles. The recent Pandemic has made this problem worse; the new posts by the company encouraged young people to reexamine their wisdom teeth issues and reach out to a specialist for a consultation.
