Flat glass, also referred to as plate or sheet glass, is most commonly used for manufacturing doors, mirrors, windows, and solar panels. It is produced by melting soda ash, sand, and silica into liquid and spreading it to the desired thickness. The molten liquid is then cooled to acquire the desired product. Flat glass is manufactured via controlled chemical and thermal reactions to ensure toughness in the structural formation. In addition, this reflector is highly flexible and customizable once it is made. As a result, flat glass finds widespread applications across various sectors, such as construction, automotive, solar energy, electronics, etc.
