While traditional plastics are made from fossil fuels and can persist in landfills and oceans for hundreds of years, Matter's products are made from renewable plant-based materials and are designed to break down into natural elements like water, CO₂, and biomass under proper composting conditions.

We're proud to bring better alternatives to the shelf—products that don't linger in the environment for generations.”

“We're proud to bring better alternatives to the shelf—products that don't linger in the environment for generations,” said Tim Busby, CEO and Founder of Matter. “This partnership with Publix puts sustainable living within reach for more families and businesses across the country.”

Matter has been featured in major media outlets including

Popular Science, WIRED, USA Today, KRON (San Francisco TV), WLNY (NYC TV), BuzzFeed, Delish, Oprah Daily, Food & Wine Magazine, KCAL (Los Angeles TV), and The Boston Globe, as well as on Good Morning America social media—validating the brand's position as a trusted, accessible alternative to traditional plastics.

Unlike traditional plastics that can take centuries to degrade, Matter's kitchen storage bags are certified BPI Industrial Compostable and TÜV Austria Industrial and Home Compostable and engineered to break down within months under appropriate composting conditions. This allows them to return to the earth as water, carbon dioxide, and biomass as long as they are composted properly. They're not just better for the environment, they are designed to make sustainability easy for everyday consumers.

This launch also aligns with growing demand for alternatives to petroleum-based plastic and is another step toward creating a more circular economy. Matter's entire line, along with its packaging, is thoughtfully designed to minimize waste at every stage.

About Matter:

Matter exists to reduce our dependence on fossil fuel-based plastics by creating certified compostable single-use products made from plants. From kitchen bags to party plates to forks, every product is thoughtfully designed and independently tested to break down under proper composting conditions. As a brand rooted in transparency, Matter is committed to helping consumers make smarter choices that don't leave waste behind.
